

Impact of Campaign Spending by Party Affiliation

This plot illustrates the relationship between campaign spending and the number of votes received by candidates. It shows that higher spending generally correlates with more votes, with distinct clustering of Democrats, Republicans, and Other Parties.

This plot compares the distribution of campaign spending among different party affiliations. It highlights that spending varies significantly within each party, with Republicans tending to have higher spending outliers compared to Democrats and Other Parties.

This plot displays the average number of votes received by candidates from each party. It indicates that both Democratic and Republican candidates receive significantly more votes on average compared to candidates from Other Parties.